Holds A 'Whatsit'

The large stone implement (above) being held by Bill Vaughan was found recently by Joe Ferrell (right) at his farm on the "loop road", (656), near Appomattox. The stone measures 13 inches at its widest point and is 11 inches long. Says Joe Ferrell, "It must have been carved by the Indian who knocked Paul Bunyon's ox in the head." Does any Indian Lore Buff have any information to offer?

Little is known about the Indian settlers here, although arrowheads and other artifests can still be found in the area. Bill Vaughan is the son of Mr. and Mrs. W. Lloyd Vaughan.

'Veteran' Train Passenger

Cecilia McDearmon is almost ten years old and a veteran of travel on the N&W 'Pocahontas' train between Appomattox and Roanoke where her grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. R. T. Anderson, live. (Above), she alights from the Sunday afternoon Pocahontas run with her grandfather, C.Lewis McDearmon, of Appomattox. Cecilia has made the Roanoke trip alone numerous times, first with a "name tag" on her collar and later, without it. Conductors and brakemen know her by name. For Cecilia, Friday, April 30, last day for the 'Pocahontas' run, will mean the end to a series of train trips that brought her much pleasure and new friendships. Other youngsters and oldsters, too, are marking the end of passenger service here with rail trips both east and west.

Curly Maple, Brass & Silver . . .

A gun collector in California will soon have this custom made Kentucky rifle, product of four months work by gunsmith Robert Carr of Wreek Island Creek. The gun is more than 5 feet long, made from Appomattox grown curly maple with 23 sterling silver inlays, hand crafted brass fittings, a carved Lion with silver eyes, a distal fink patch box and intricate workmanship of both metal and wooden parts of the gun. Yankees used this type of gun to kill the British, says gunmaker Carr. Modern day hunters like the accuracy and "feel" of the Kentucky rifle, he adds. For Carr, gunmaking is an art and a science. He is following in the footsteps of the late Hacker Martin, of Wreck Island, whose guns are valued throughout the U. S.
